Small publisher's new website not only a store, also an extensive in-depth resource and artistic hub.

In March, Free News Projects, an independent publisher working in art and music, relaunches its website. Primarily a storefront showcasing the publisher's books, music and art, the website also serves as the first-stop resource for information about Free News associated artists and projects, an archive and exhibition space for their exclusive material, and a hub for kindred artistic endeavors and ideas.

Particularly exciting is the relaunch of the Free News Projects blog. Updated every weekday, it represents the Free News thought process in physical form, and seeks to separate itself from the myriad shoals of daily art blogs. The blog builds original ideas—step by step—through plainspoken discovery, superior-content links, a global and historical eye, proud originality, and a direct, jargon-free confrontation of the latest ideas sprouting in the minds of contemporary artists.

The new website also features an extensive artists section. Each page provides a glimpse into the life of a featured Free News Projects artist, detailing their current and past endeavours, sources of inspiration and biographical information. Pictures of the artist and their artwork and links to external resources create an intimacy and sense of depth between artists and readers.

Free News will also be releasing two long-awaited projects this spring: an illustrated Grey Gardens book and the Wolf Parade vinyl picture disc. Visit www.freenewsprojects.com for more information.
